

Author Carol Wall received her third cancer diagnosis in 2012, just a few months before Mister Owita's Guide to Gardening was published by Amy Einhorn Books. Wall was too sick to make appearances, and she passed away in December 2014, just nine months after publication. Since Carol's death, the Wall family, led by her husband Dick Wall, has redoubled their efforts to promote Carol's work. Wall's debut book, "Mister Owita's Guide to Gardening" was published March 4, 2014 to critical acclaim, named one of the top ten books of 2014 by USA Today and one of the best books of 2014 by AARP.

Mister Owita's Guide to Gardening: How I Learned the Unexpected Joy of a Green Thumb and an Open Heart, is the first-person, nonfiction story about Carol Wall's unlikely friendship with Giles Owita, a Kenyan-born landscape designer who took on the arduous task of rehabilitating Wall's neglected yard in Roanoke, Virginia. More importantly, though, he tended to Wall's wounded spirit. Diagnosed with cancer before she met Owita, Wall had begun to lose faith in her religion, humanity and herself. The book follows their blossoming friendship, their unusual relationship creating a bond that bridged their disparate backgrounds and taught them both about the wonderful secrets life has in store. The New York Times Book Review wrote, "You will put Wall's memoir down with a new appreciation for how far roots can travel for nourishment, especially those that spring from our heart."
